

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The work of publishing the excavations on the Borgo north-west has involved many people and taken much time. After the passing away of architect Börje Blomé in 1998, my old colleagues from our common work in Persepolis came to my assistance in completing this work. Giuseppe Tilia († 2001), his sons Stefano and Alessandro, as well as his wife Angela Bizzarro, transferred all of Blomé's hand-produced drawings to the digital world. Furthermore, they took additional measurements and finally realized a complete digital plan of all of the excavated areas of San Giovenale (Fig. 10). I thank them for their invaluable work and Angela Bizzarro for writing the description of their work, printed here as Appendix 5.

Richard Holmgren, Kerstin Bellerba, Lars Karlsson and Brita Alroth have all worked with different aspects of the present publication and I wish to thank them for that, as I wish to thank all of my colleagues, helpers and friends. Julia Sigurdson took many of the new photographs and she has also assisted me in adding letters and names of buildings, walls and other features on the photographs.

Thanks go also to the Soprintendenza per i Beni Archeologici dell'Etruria Meridionale, especially Mario Moretti, Paola Pelagatti, Anna Maria Sgubini Moretti, Irene Berlingò and Gabriella Barbieri and to Massimo Pallottino and Giovanni Colonna for many years of friendly collaboration. I would also like to thank Barbara Belelli Marchesini who wrote the analysis of the masonry, published here as Appendix 2. I also wish to thank G.F. Guidi and G. Giardino for friendly collaboration on the metal finds.

Örjan Wikander, roof-tile expert, has kindly provided an analysis of the roof-tiles from the area, here appearing as Appendix 4. I also thank Marie Klingspor Rotstein and Daniel Kwiatkowski for their analyses in Appendix 3 of the mortar that was discovered between the blocks in the excavated houses. Their research is very important, since we have so little preserved mortar from the Archaic period.

I am also grateful to The Swedish Institute of Classical Studies in Rome, The Fondazione Famiglia Rausing, The Royal Swedish Academy of Letters, History and Antiquities, the Friends of the Swedish Institute in Rome and to the Comune di Civitella Cesi and Blera for financial and other support through many years.

Finally, but not the least, I want to thank my excellent workmen during the years at San Giovenale. They all came from Blera: Mariano Bertocci, Bartolomeo Coletta, Giovanni Tedeschi and his son Antonio, Aldo and Angelo Coletta, Francesco Pagliari and Mario Perazzoni.
